quantity. In dynamic systems, signals representative of dynamic quantities are frequently manipulated to achieve a desired result. For example, electrical motors are frequently manipulated to control the dynamic quantity associated with a load coupled to the motor. For instance, motor speed may be manipulated to control the speed of a load coupled to the motor. Many motors of this type are controlled by pulse width modulation (PWM) control signals. The PWM control signals may be generated by an electronic controller that receives input signals from various sources, including a sensor for the dynamic quantity and/or a microprocessor for controlling the motor. The PWM control signals are typically converted to analog signals, and the
